For generations, milk has been promoted as a food source that is packed with vitamins and minerals. However, nutrition experts have recently begun to question whether milk really is good for us.

Let's look first at the benefits of drinking milk. Milk has a high concentration of calcium and vitamin D, which are necessary for maintaining strong bones. People who don't drink milk tend not to get enough of these nutrients, and this can lead to bone loss and fractures.

Another benefit of milk is that it contains a lot of potassium, which regulates the amount of salt in the body. Too much salt and too little potassium may increase the risk of high blood pressure. Some scientists also think that the acids found in milk can reduce the chances of a heart attack. Milk has also been linked to a lower risk of certain diseases such as colon cancer.

However, several recent studies have shown that milk isn't all it's cracked up to be. One analysis revealed that milk doesn't reduce the risk of fractures, while other studies indicated that a high consumption of milk actually increases fracture rates. , it was shown that countries with the lowest milk consumption have the lowest rates of fractures.

Research conducted in Canada and in Italy has also linked milk consumption to a higher risk of prostate cancer. Over recent decades, other studies have linked milk consumption to acne, asthma, heart disease, and other problems.

Presented with so much conflicting evidence on the benefits of milk, what should we do? There's no need to avoid milk altogether, but it's also probably not necessary to drink as much of it as was suggested in the past. For those of us wanting to cut back on milk consumption, there are plenty of other healthy choices.

To many people, particularly in America, every good Chinese meal should end with a fortune cookie. So would you believe that one place you won't see a fortune cookie is in China?

These cookies have a long and mysterious history—one that doesn't begin in China. According to researcher Yasuko Nakamachi, fortune cookies actually originated in Japan! Ms. Nakamachi first saw Japanese fortune cookies at a bakery while visiting a popular temple outside Kyoto in the 1990s. However, the baker was folding a paper fortune into a fold on the outside of the cookie, not the inside, like the fortune cookies we are used to.

Ms. Nakamachi was very curious about this, and decided to do her own research. After spending six years going through thousands of old documents and drawings, and interviewing bakers around the country, she realized that fortune cookies used to be very popular in Japan. The reason that Takeshi Matsuhisa, the baker, puts the fortune on the outside of the cookie is to make sure that people don't accidentally eat the paper!

Ms. Nakamachi found a drawing that went as far back as 1878, showing a Japanese man making the same kind of cookies as Matsuhisa's bakery. This is interesting because a number of people claimed to have invented fortune cookies in California in the 1920s.

If these cookies are a Japanese invention, then why are they served in American Chinese restaurants? After interviewing many Japanese and Chinese American families, Ms. Nakamachi suggested that it's likely that Japanese people first started serving fortune cookies in their restaurants when they moved to the United States. Then Chinese restaurant owners borrowed the idea and began making their own fortune cookies, beginning the now-traditional practice of serving fortune cookies at the end of each meal.

Today, about three billion of these cookies are made annually in the U.S., and are served in restaurants all over the world. Although fortune cookies might not be a traditional snack in China, they have become one for people in many other countries.

問 1 According to this passage, which of the following is true? (5)

- ① Most of fortune cookies served in restaurants in the U.S. are baked in Japan.
- ② People in the U.S. enjoy starting a Chinese meal with a fortune cookie.
